

Afghanistan War

The absence of periodic reality checks created the risk of doing the wrong thing perfectly:
A project that completed required tasks would be considered "successful," whether or not it had achieved or contributed to broader, more important goals.

What We Need To Learn: Lessons from Twenty Years of Afghanistan Reconstruction, the final SIGAR report

[SIGAR is the Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction]