

Evolution

In a world of synthetic gene drives, the border between the human and the natural, between the laboratory and the wild, already deeply blurred, all but dissolves.

In such a world, not only do people determine the conditions under which evolution is taking place, people can — again, in principle — determine the outcome.

Elizabeth Kolbert,
*Under a White Sky