

Government

The commonly held view that the more governments do, the less freedom people have is ... mistaken. Governments do sometimes restrict freedom, sometimes justifiably, sometimes not ... But at other times government action can increase freedom by giving people options that they would not have otherwise because of cost. We need to look at particular policies, to see whether in opening options up they are closing down other ones that are more important.

David Miller, Political Philosophy