

History

At least until the eighteenth century, and even to a certain degree thereafter, all events described by an historian were made to conform to an image of reality that governed all social thought.

Historians did not argue from the particular to the general, rather they made particular events and people conform to the traditional types or patterns.

Norman E. Cantor and Richard I. Schneider,
How to Study History