

Housing

The Fuenteses' fall from homeownership into housing instability offers a preview of how climate change will affect us over the century to come: It will alter not just where we live, but how we live. Long-term homeownership will become more difficult and more expensive in many places, and many communities will find themselves upended or erased, separating millions of people from the places they call home.

By the end of the century, our ideas about what "home" means will have been substantially unsettled.

Jack Bittle,
New York Times, February 4, 2023