

Reading

For thirty years, very young children have gone to schools and been told that reading is an exercise in seeking confirmation of what they already know — these children who are at the beginning of knowing anything at all. It's as if we've been training them to be algorithms, honing their ability to make predictions rather than their capacity to enter the minds of others.

Christine Smallwood,
New York Review of Books, February 9, 2023