

Religion

It once was generally assumed that religious beliefs shaped political views, not the other way round.

But recent evidence indicates that the causality can run the other way: panel studies have found that many people change their political views first and then become less religious.

Ronald Inglehart,
Foreign Affairs, September/October 2020