

Science education

Government-supported early education [in the United States] is funded mainly at the state and local level ... and because science courses are the most expensive per student, few schools in relatively poor districts can afford to offer many of them.

Students from these districts therefore end up being less prepared for university-level science than are their wealthier peers, many of whom attended well-appointed private schools.

Nature, Vol. 537, 22 September 2016